An unemployed journalist among the Idomeni refugees

Antonios Repanas, an accomplished and well-known sports journalist in Greece, found himself out in the cold when crisis hit. Unemployed after sixteen years working on a major national daily, he adopted a completely new focus by going to the Idomeni camp and reporting on the refugee crisis. As a result of this decision, Antonios feels that he is today once again fulfilling his vocation to keep people informed, even though his output is disregarded by the media in his own country.

Antonios Repanas
Freelance journalist, www.humanstories.gr
Translation from the Greek by Kathleen Llanwarne
At a distance of two kilometres discarded objects of all kinds could be seen strewn everywhere in the fields on both sides of the road: clothes, shoes, blankets, sleeping bags, remnants of food and packaging, rags, nappies. Evidence that thousands of people had passed through this area on foot. When we were half a kilometre away the Idomeni encampment came into view. This is the place through which more than a million refugees passed within less than a year in the course of the biggest refugee population movement seen in Europe since World War II.

It was November 2015 and since Christmas 2014 – as a sports columnist employed for 16 years by Lambrakis, the largest publishing business in Greece, signing articles in Zi Vema, the Sunday newspaper with the largest circulation – this proverb seemed evidently to refer to the only solution to which any of us could resort should we find ourselves caught in an employment storm. Yet a storm is an utterly different phenomenon depending on whether you are observing it from the safety of a shelter or are out in the open and fully exposed to it. When you are caught in a storm you freeze up and become so numbed by the pain that you can no longer function. All you can think about is where you might shelter, where you can hide yourself away until the storm is over. Under such circumstances, the idea of building a windmill is really the furthest thing from your mind.

The ‘storm’ in the Greek press began at around the same time as the economic crisis. Over the months and years I saw – as a member of the abovementioned trade union administration council – increasing numbers of my fellow journalists becoming unemployed. There were many with whom I had worked in the past and others whose work I had admired from afar. I knew that these were quality professionals and that, if they had become unemployed, it was because they had been unlucky enough to find themselves in the wrong place at the wrong time. The economic crisis in Greece stirred up additional turbulence in the press. The newspapers had already forgotten that what they were supposed to be selling was quality news reporting, investigation, reliable and up-to-date facts and information. Instead, in the years before the crisis erupted they had been basing their sales on ‘offers’: music CDs,
I had been a member of the Thrace and Macedonia journalists’ trade union council for three years and was well acquainted with the facts of the situation as far as unemployment was concerned. It is my belief that no situation can be more fundamentally uncomfortable. I remember that numerous colleagues would suggest, ‘well, now that you have plenty of time, why not drop into the office for a coffee?’ I did go once or twice, but I soon stopped. Early on in my unemployment I also went a few times to the sports ground and there I felt even more uncomfortable. My former colleagues were all working, looking for news, interviewing players, identifying the decisive feature that would explain which side won and which lost, while I simply watched the game and left the ground before the press conference began. My feeling was that I simply no longer had any business being there at all.

Idomeni as an opportunity

Idomeni represented for me, as well as a learning opportunity, the chance to ‘build a windmill’. Without being initially aware of it, I was beginning to cover a significant gap in the hitherto available news about the refugee situation. My initial curiosity to get to know these people subsequently led me to want to enable others to get to know them too; to want to tell the world, in other words, that the refugees are people no different from the rest of us. Indeed, the refugees that I met in Idomeni, the Greek islands and northern Greece, really are just like us. Gradually I began to recognise, among these people and the tales of their lives, my very own family’s story. Both of my mother’s parents were refugees from Asia Minor: my grandmother, Marika, came from Balıkyak and her two sisters Katina and Despina, following exactly the same route taken by the refugees today, from Smyrna to Lesbos and from there to the Greek mainland. Her parents and other five siblings had been killed in Asia Minor. She and her sisters were found, through the Red Cross, by their mother’s brother who, having also lost his own family in Asia Minor, adopted them.

On the first few days, arriving at Idomeni, I got out of the car cautiously and somewhat fearfully. Because, ever since 1986 when I signed my first newspaper article, I had worked as a sports reporter, refugee issues represented a completely new world for me. It was in early November that I began to go increasingly frequently to Idomeni. Whenever there were developments or events in the camp, I would immediately post photos or videos on my Facebook page. Little by little I overcame my fears and began to hold more extensive conversations with the refugees. I would ask them about their journey, about their lives in the countries they had left behind, about aspects of their living conditions in the Idomeni camp. At that time the borders were still open but in mid-November, and especially after the terrorist attacks in Paris, the first problems began to surface. The Balkan route was closed for all nationalities except Syrians, Iraqis and Afghans, leaving thousands of refugees from Iran, Pakistan and Morocco, principally, but also Bangladesh, Algeria and other African countries stuck in Idomeni. On 2 December the Iranians blocked the border passage and the troubles began. Idomeni, in late November and early December, and particularly at night, was not a very safe place to be.

"1. Both cities are located in the Balıkesir province of northwestern Turkey."

Throughout that period I was posting refugee stories and photos on Facebook. Whenever there was any new development in the camp I would report it immediately, directly from my mobile, accompanied by a short text. Though quite a number of colleagues ‘liked’ my posts, never did I receive an offer of cooperation from any of them. Many congratulated me on my work but none proposed to host my articles on their web page – apart from one colleague, Stelios Moshoulas, who had a website on water sports Aquaplanet.gr and asked me whether I would like to publish my articles there. This is how I came to be publishing, on a website dealing with water sports, reports on the refugee situation.

Adjusting to the facts of the new situation

For a journalist who had worked for around thirty years exclusively as a sports reporter, the transition to refugee issues was no easy step. Yet it was immensely interesting to begin investigative journalism in a totally new field. I had at my fingertips the basic principles of journalism; I knew how to seek out sources; I had made a name for myself in the press – albeit as a sports columnist – and this was of help to me in approaching sources, especially in the world of politics and culture, the police, and the Greek NGOs, but also among the local population.

Quite frequently when I gave my name I was asked my opinion of one of the Thessaloniki football teams. On a number of occasions, through conversations about football, I managed to gain access to sources that would have been unavailable to an accredited journalist dealing with refugee issues or a freelance political journalist. While some indeed found it strange that I was writing about refugee questions, many – especially ordinary people opened up much more easily and were prepared to help me with my investigations because I was familiar to them from my role as sports reporter. What also helped a lot in this respect is that, as I have explained, I had been working for the last sixteen years on the highest-circulation – but also highly reputable – newspaper in Greece Ta Nea. It often happens that the media channel for which you work, or have worked, somehow rubs off on you so that you embody particular characteristics in a way that causes people to position themselves differently in relation to you. Generally speaking, it is difficult to undertake reporting unless you represent a particular media outlet. People tend to be suspicious of journalists who say they are freelancers because they like to know where the things they are telling you will be published. Nor are you likely to gain much credibility if you announce that you publish your articles on Facebook. If I mentioned Aquaplanet, the reception was a bit better. Subsequently, after I had created, together with two colleagues, the Humanstories.gr website, I started to feel perfectly comfortable telling people which media outlet I represented.

Idomeni and the refugee situation gave me the opportunity to experience a rebirth in journalism.

Even those colleagues from other Greek media channels who were responsible for reporting refugee affairs were well disposed towards me. A relevant point here is that I was not in competition with them as, initially, I was writing only on Facebook, later on Aquaplanet, and towards the end on Humanstories.gr. For these colleagues I myself represented a source in relation to events at Idomeni because I was never short of time and was on the spot nearly every day. I could afford to spend hours on end with the refugees in the camp, gaining their trust and learning more about their difficult experiences. Frequently colleagues from other Greek media channels phoned me, in the context of their own reporting missions, with a request for information or for help in contacting someone within the camp.

As from February 2016 Idomeni became the major game board in refugee affairs around which governments and politicians moved pawns that were nothing other than human lives. On account of my experience on the ground, several foreign media channels expressed interest in working with me. Idomeni and the refugee situation thus gave me the opportunity to experience a rebirth in journalism – working exclusively, it should be pointed out, with foreign channels and on Humanstories.gr because, within Greece itself, the situation remains still the same. The fire that began almost simultaneously with the crisis is still raging, forcing ever more journalists into unemployment, reducing even further newspaper sales and the credibility of what mainstream media remain. In the press, the crisis is much more one of management than of journalism. Managers in the media have failed to understand that the environment has changed and that what they are trying to sell is no longer of interest to anyone; at the same time, they lack the courage to fundamentally change their media profiles so as to appeal to a new readership. Now is the right time to build windmills: it is a matter of taking the pulse of the new environment, of demonstrating adaptability, and of being prepared to take risks.